Hi all, me again! It only seems right to start this article by addressing the sad passing of George Baldock, a talented player who left us far too soon. His legacy serves as a poignant reminder of how precious our time in football truly is.

Watching my son recently take to the pitch as a mascot for West Ham United was a moment filled with pride. Not only was he living out his dream, but he was also celebrating his birthday in the best way possible—leading the team onto the field in front of thousands of fans. Seeing him so excited and embracing the role was incredibly heartwarming, and it reminded me of the joy that football brings to families.

Recently, I had the opportunity to play at The London Stadium in a charity match, in support of DEBRA - www.debra.org.uk - the butterfly skin charity, and it was an experience I cherished. Being involved in events like this is always a pleasure, knowing that we can use our love for the game to support important causes. The atmosphere was electric, and the camaraderie among players was a reminder of why I fell in love with football in the first place.

Giving back to the community through charity matches not only helps those in need but also strengthens the bonds within the football family. I believe it's vital to use our platform for good, and every time I step onto that pitch for a cause, it reminds me of the impact we can make together.

These experiences reaffirm the importance of connection, both on and off the field. Whether as a player or a proud father, I will always cherish the moments that allow us to celebrate the game while supporting others.

On a personal note, I'm excited to soon announce my latest project, something I've been working on that I believe will resonate with fans and the community. It's a thrilling endeavor, and I can't wait to share it with you all. Be sure to check back for my next article, where I'll reveal more details

Thanks
Marlon
